A ship in port flying flags. Wwith flying colors (with flying colors in American English) is a popular idiom of the English language, which is used to describe how well someone has completed the task. For example, the common use of the phrase is to refer to someone who has passed an exam or other tests with flying colors, ie. The phrase originated in the age of discovery, when ships returned to port with their flags (colors) either raised or lowered, meaning that the ship was either successful or defeated, with raised flags indicating success and lowered flags indicating defeat. Thus, with flying colors literally means that someone has completed the task, although idiomatically indicates a specific success in this task. History Pirates can reveal their identity when boarding an unsuspecting ship to create an atmosphere of fear. [1] Ships serve scientific and cultural needs, as well as transportation of goods, use in diplomacy and warfare. In the past, without the use of modern communication devices, the appearance of the ship after an immediate return to port could tell how the crew is doing at sea. Ships that have won their efforts – such as encountering an enemy ship[2] – sail to port with flags flying from masts. [3] A ship that was defeated would be forced to strike its colors or lower its flags, indicating defeat. This practice was particularly important in the age of discovery, and before 18. [4] It later began to be used in the folk language to mark any kind of triumph. Another phrase, going down with flying colors or going down with the colors of flying[5] evokes a determined crew struggle, even before their ship sinks. As an idiom, it means that someone has failed at something, even if putting a great deal of effort towards it. [6] The variant of this sentence is naming your colors to the mast and means that someone has done something to irreversibly commit to a task or matter; referring to the fact that literally nailing flags to the mast, the flags cannot be taken down to mark defeat. [4] [5] The word color is a common way to describe the flags and insignia of military units. [5] Flags or insignia may be referred to as colours in a non-military context in order to express patriotism and nationality; other such phrases include true colors or show your colors. [5] Flying colors, of course, refers to unfurled flags' [7] positions on the mast, and variants to take off ... [8] or pass... simply means returning from the sea and passing through to the port, respectively. Similarly, the term sailing under false colors was a reference to tactics used by pirates or naval robbers. [3] By raising a friendly flag, an unsuspecting ship would allow a pirate ship to approach without access to pirates on board their vessel. [5] Edward Teach, a pirate known as Blackbeam, famously did, and sometimes after looking at their ship, with a pirate flag that replaced the deceptive friendly, the ship immediately gave up. [1] However, this was not historically limited to pirates because the Royal Navy used this tactic to pursue Bartholomew Roberts. [5] The use of these phrases has been used many times in literary works, including in modern writings. [9] With flying colors, he has many variations in front of him, such as passing,... coming out..., and passing ...,[9] but all have essentially the same meaning derived from allusions[4] to naval triumph or victory,[10][11] honor or public success. [12] Go down with colours flying and Nail your colors to the mast are used similarly to naval inuendo, and are phrases to express perseverance or stubbornness. [13] Sailing under false colours, which corresponds to its maritime origin,[14] is another way to express fraud,[15] or mislead or mystify.
